This scholarship was made possible through an endowment by Mary E. and Robert E. Turner in 1996. "For us, this past fifty years has proven that education, real life hard work, and determination for achievement pays off in the form of a happy marriage, career advancement, and finally a desire to convince others that the effort is really worthwhile," wrote Robert Turner in a letter addressed to the Foundation in 1996. Robert and Mary Turner were married during World War II and always faced the uncertainty of the future as a team. Early on in their marriage, the couple decided that they could do almost anything in life as long as they had strong determination and one another. The couple acted as a team to overcome every obstacle that they encountered. For example, the couple made the long journey through the western part of the country, relying on a 1934 Ford that required a complete overhaul after every trip to a new air base. "Mary reclined the brakes while I installed an extra tank for rationed gas," notes Robert in his letter.

Throughout the years the couple built three houses, two of which with their own hands. Their unbreakable partnership helped them to deal with the challenges that came with caring for a family. The couple had four children and eleven grandchildren. After working as a pilot, instructor, and director of an advanced flying school during World War II, Robert served in the Air Force Reserves. As a civilian, his career progressed from foreman to engineer, general manager, Vice President, and finally retiring at age 70 as the Chief Operating Officer and Executive Vice President of an international company producing plastic, rubber, and magnetic products. Mary worked as the Chief Operator of a telephone office and later manager of the couple's own Tanglewood Farms.
